

Some of the most meaningful experiences on campus happen because a group of students had an idea — an event that brought people together, a program that helped someone feel less alone, or an initiative that opened doors for others. Student organizations are where community is built.

But behind every successful event or program is something less visible: the resources that make it possible.

Through my involvement with student groups (Asexuality Club, Creative Arts Club, Multicultural Club among many others) I've seen how passionate students are about building things for this campus. I've also seen how confusing and frustrating the financial side of things can sometimes be. Navigating funding shouldn't feel like a barrier to creativity or community.

To me, this role is about more than budgets and spreadsheets. It's about stewardship — making sure student funds are managed responsibly, transparently, and in ways that truly support the people and organizations working to make this campus better.

When students have the support they need, great ideas become real opportunities. Events happen. Communities grow. Students feel like they belong here.

As Treasurer, I want to help make sure the systems behind the scenes work for students — so the ideas, passion, and creativity on this campus can thrive.
